QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. Whether a contract claim independent from a plan enforcement claim is cognizable under ERISA.

2. If so, whether the contract should be construed based on federal common law principles.

PARTIES TO THE PROCEEDING

Petitioner

Petitioner is Donald W. Stearns, an individual citizen of the United States, residing within the District of Minnesota. Stearns has no corporate affiliations. Stearns was the plaintiff in the District Court and the appellee/cross-appellant in the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals.

Respondent

NCR Corporation is a publicly traded corporation. Petitioner is unaware of any publicly held company owning 10% or more of its stock. NCR Health Care Plan for Retired Employee is a group welfare benefit plan under ERISA. Respondents were the defendants in the District Court, and the appellants/cross-appellees before the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals.

Petitioner respectfully petition for a Writ of Certiorari to review the judgment of the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals in this case.

OPINIONS BELOW

The Eighth Circuit opinion (App. B at 2a) is reported at 297 F.3d 706 (2002). The District Court opinion (App. C at 14a is reported at 97 F. Supp. 2d 954 (2000).

STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

The judgment of the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals was entered on July 22, 2002. The Court of Appeals entered an order denying a timely petition for rehearing en banc on September 4, 2002 (App. A at 1a).

The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked through 28 U.S.C. § 1254(1).

CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS INVOLVED

The Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974, as amended, 29 U.S.C. §§1001-1461.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. Facts

The class in this case consists of approximately 3,500 former NCR employees and spouses who accepted what was called alternatively as either the 1993 "Early Out" or "Enhanced Retirement" program. (For consistency, Stearns will refer to it as the "Enhanced Retirement Program.")

1. October 1, 1993: Initial announcement of Enhanced Retirement Program

On October 1, 1993, Stearns and all other class members received "NCR Newsline - a Special Announcement from [NCR chief executive] Jerre Stead," giving them their first information about the Enhanced Retirement Program. Explained the Trial Court: "This newsletter generally outlined the program's eligibility requirements and stated that more detailed information concerning the program would be forthcoming."[1]

2. October 6, 1993: The formal announcement and detailed information.

The promised "informational packets" were sent one week later in the form of two memoranda, each of which contained basically identical terms. Each advised employees that:

> The purpose of this memo is to provide you with the information and resources you need to thoroughly evaluate this important opportunity.

Attached to the two memoranda were essentially identical "Questions and Answers Guides" and charts entitled "Summary of the NCR Retiree Health Care Plans," showing the specific detail of the "Option One" and "Choice Two" programs that were made available exclusively to the Enhanced Retirement Plan participants. The Trial Court observed: "The Q & A Guide contains as an attachment a very thorough description of the benefits offered under 'Option 1' and 'Choice 2' and the 'Supplemental Plan for Medicare,' defining everything from deductibles, copayments, and out-of-pocket maximums to the degree of coverage offered for specifically enumerated medical, dental, and mental health services."[2]

These documents state that

- "you will receive OPTION 1 (90/10) Health Care Coverage ..."

-or-

- "you will receive CHOICE 2 (80/20) Health Care Coverage ..."

-and-

- "at age 65, all associates ... will receive the Supplemental Plan to Medicare."

3. December 17, 1993: The release.

All class members signed a release. This document

- was required to be executed by NCR for all early retirees on or before December 17, 1993;

[2] Stearns, 97 F. Supp.2d at 958.

- was in fact executed by all retirees; and

- looks and works exactly like a garden variety contract, employing the concept of consideration and requiring signatures by both parties. The Trial Court noted: "The Releases thus constitute agreements that are in writing, signed, and supported by consideration. They therefore meet the requirements of written bilateral contracts."[3]

4. January 1, 1993: The January 1993 Group Plan.

Predating the Enhanced Retirement documents is the "Group Benefits Plan for Salaried Employees - Effective 1/1/93." It is this booklet that contained the reservation of rights.

Retirees, under Part VII of the January 1993 Group Plan, may choose either "Plan A" or "Plan C" health care benefits. The document does not refer anywhere to the "Option One" or "Choice 2" plans that were offered to Enhanced Retirement participants. And the only reference to the January 1993 Group Plan in the entire body of the Enhanced Retirement documents is found in a footnote, which recommends that "[y]our (sic) should refer to our Group Benefits booklet . . . for the details of the NCR Health Care Plans." As a matter of law, such oblique reference is not enough to incorporate the January 1993 Group Plan:

[3] Id. at 964.

> For the terms of another document to be incorporated by reference into the document executed by the parties, the reference must be clear and unequivocal, and must be called to the attention of the other party, he must consent thereto, and the terms of the incorporated document must be known or easily available to the contracting parties.[4]

5. The cutbacks.

Effective January 1, 1999, NCR

- terminated entirely the Supplemental Plan to Medicare (except for those who had already turned 65);

-and-

- increased the deductible and copayment requirements for the Option 1 and Choice 2 enrollees.

This lawsuit challenges NCR's right to cut the benefits that formed the consideration underlying the class's early retirement severance agreements. Three counts were asserted: a plan enforcement claim, a breach of contract claim, and a breach of fiduciary duty claim.

B. The Trial Court's Decision

The Trial Court dismissed Stearns's claims for plan enforcement and breach of fiduciary duty. The Trial Court, however, found 1) there was no theoretical bar to recognizing and enforcing a contract even within the context of an ERISA plan 2) the release constituted a contract 3) whose terms were ambiguous. Applying common law principles, the Trial Court construed the contract (the severance agreement) against its drafter (NCR), and granted summary judgment for Stearns.

C. The Eighth Circuit's Decision

The Eighth Circuit affirmed the Trial Court's dismissal of two of Stearns's counts. As to the breach of contract claim, the panel found that the Trial Court misconstrued the four corners of the contract. "The Releases contained some contract terms, but most of the terms were set forth in the documents which offered the [Enhanced Retirement] Program to eligible employees. Those documents and the Releases collectively formed the bilateral contracts."[5]

Stearns agrees with that finding, which was his position in his summary judgment papers.

Nevertheless, the panel held that, because this was an ERISA case, the Trial Court "erred in looking beyond ERISA plan interpretation principles by splitting plaintiffs' single ERISA claim into distinct ERISA and breach-of-contract components."[6] (It is possible that the panel mistakenly assumed that a breach of contract claim was not separately pled. It was).

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE PETITION

I. The Decision Of The Eighth Circuit Court Of Appeals Conflicts With Decisions Of Other Circuits

A. The Eighth Circuit's analysis conflicts with every other circuit as to the enforceability of a contract within an ERISA plan

Every other circuit to have confronted the issue, either head-on or tangentially, has concluded that "Federal substantive law" recognizes the existence and enforceability of a contract even when that contract defines rights arising under ERISA plans.

The Seventh Circuit's jurisprudence is the most developed. In Frahm v. Equitable Life Assur. Soc. Co.,[7] the Seventh Circuit observed that "[b]ilateral agreements on the length of vacation and amount of severance pay are common, and if these are proper then bilateral agreements about health care also must be proper."[8] This led to the Seventh Circuit's decision in Bock v. Computer Assoc. Intern., Inc.,[9] where a severance agreement dealing with a benefit plan was subject to ERISA but nevertheless interpreted "under general contract principles, without giving special weight to the intent of either party."[10] Explained the Seventh Circuit:

[8] Id. at 957.

[9] 257 F.3d 700 (7th Cir. 2001).

> It has been uniformly held that general principles of contract law - under the federal common law that guides interpretation of ERISA plans - are to be applied to the interpretation of the language of such severance agreements. See Anstett v. Eagle-Picher Indus., Inc., 203 F.3d 501, 503 (7th Cir. 2000) ("the claim for separation benefits [under this ERISA plan] is really a claim to enforce a contract") (citation omitted); Grun v. Pneumo Abex Corp., 163 F.3d 411, 419 (7th Cir. 1998) ("we construe [the severance compensation agreement] in accordance with the federal common law under ERISA and general rules of contract interpretation"); Collins v. Ralston Purina Co., 147 F.3d 592 (7th Cir. 1998); Murphy v. Keystone Steel & Wire Co., 61 F.3d 560 (7th Cir. 1995); Hickey v. A.E. Staley Mfg., 995 F.2d 1385 (7th Cir. 1993); Taylor [v. Continental Group Change in Control Severance Pay Plan, 933 F.2d 1227, 1232-33 (3rd Cir. 1991)].[11]

The Second Circuit, in Devlin v. Empire Blue Cross,[12] citing the Restatement (Second) of Contracts, held that an ERISA plan provision that promised life insurance to all retirees who work for 20 years and retire after age 55 "can be construed as an offer that specifies performance as the means of acceptance - sometimes referred to as an offer for a unilateral contract - and promises lifetime life insurance benefits upon performance."[13] The Second Circuit vacated and remanded the trial court's dismissal of this count, which the Second Circuit described by the following: "Essentially, plaintiffs assert under this section a 'contractual right under a benefit plan.' "[14]

In Sprague v. General Motors Corp.,[15] the Sixth Circuit en banc rejected a claim that certain ERISA documents constituted an enforceable contract. But notably, "[t]he sixth circuit's en banc decision in Sprague observes that plans must be in writing, which sets limits on the scope of bilateral agreements, but the court did not deny that such agreements are possible if required forms are observed."[16]

B. The Eighth Circuit's analysis conflicts with every other circuit as to the applicability of common law principles

The Stearns panel concluded that, even if a contract was recognized, it must be construed by plan enforcement principles, rather than the common law rules of construction

[13] Id. at 84.

[16] Frahm, 137 F.3d at 958 (emphasis in original).

governing contracts. The panel based its decision on the fact that the Seventh Circuit's decision that recognized bilateral contracts about welfare benefits "did not suggest that benefits disputes arising out of bilateral contracts that established or amend an ERISA plan would not be governed by ERISA plan interpretation principles."[17]

The significance of this second finding is critical, yet unstated. In ERISA plan enforcement cases, it is the employer's intent that controls. In contracts, the parties' intent governs.

While the Stearns panel was correct that the Seventh Circuit in Frahm did not suggest (or even address) the rules of construction for ERISA bilateral contracts, the panel was wrong in its apparent assumption that Frahm represented the Seventh Circuit's last word on the subject. That came in Bock, where the Seventh Circuit rejected the argument that ERISA plan enforcement interpretation rules governed the construction of an ERISA preempted severance agreement. "[W]e are dealing here with severance agreements, contractual in form, conferring benefits on the employer as well as the employee and quite distinguishable from vested benefits under a pension plan."[18] Instead, the severance agreement should be construed "under general contract principles, without giving special weight to the intent of either party."[19]

[18] 257 F.3d at 704.

So too, the Third Circuit distinguished between ERISA plans generally, which focus on the intent of the settlor (in this case, NCR) from severance agreements, which focus on the parties' intent:

> When an ERISA plan is ambiguous, ascertaining its meaning requires examining many factors, which may include considering how the plan was understood by its beneficiaries. In [Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. v. Bruch, 489 U.S. 101, 112 (1989)], The Supreme Court quoted language from the Restatement (Second) of Trusts indicating that only the "intention of the settlor" is relevant. But trust law cannot be imported wholesale into the ERISA context. Severance plans are often similar to employment contracts, whose interpretation requires determining the intent of both contracting parties.[20]

The Second Circuit in Devlin took the Bock analysis to the next logical step, concluding that when an ERISA plan participant performs his end of a unilateral contract (by working 20 years and retiring after 55), the employer's offer of benefits has been accepted, and "[w]hen the offeror did not explicitly reserve the power to revoke, such an offer cannot be revoked once the offeree has begun to perform."[21]

The Eighth Circuit analysis cannot be squared with the other circuits' treatment of these two dispositive issues.

II. The Decision Of The Eighth Circuit Is Incorrect

The Stearns panel viewed the fact that this is an ERISA case as fatal to Stearns's breach of contract claim. This was error. ERISA preemption only frames and does not answer the issue as to the viability of a contract claim.

The severance agreement unquestionably would be recognized as a free-standing enforceable contract outside the ERISA context. With a single sentence worth of analysis, however, the Stearns panel concluded that the Trial Court was wrong to apply federal common law principles to construe it.[22] This overly simplistic analysis ignores the intent of the [21] 274 F.3d at 84 (citing Restatement (Second) of Contracts 45(1) (1981)). See Stearns 97 F. Supp.2d at 965 ("Generally, when a contract lacks any enumerated contingencies, the consideration promised under that contract is not subject to unilateral amendment . . . . [NCR] now seek[s] to avoid that obligation even though plaintiff's [sic] have irrevocably performed their obligations under the contract by retiring and releasing all potential claims arising from their employment.").

[22] Stearns, 297 F.3d at 711 ("The claim is of course contractual in nature, but the district court erred in looking beyond ERISA plan interpretation principles by splitting plaintiffs' single ERISA claim into distinct ERISA and breach-of-contract components.")

Congress that drafted ERISA, which is, after all, "the ultimate touchstone."[23]

ERISA's "conspicuous[ly]"[24] broad preemption provision[25] reserved to federal authority the sole power to regulate employee benefits. But ERISA does not expressly cover all of the issues formerly resolved under state common law. The Congress that drafted ERISA anticipated this, and intended the federal judiciary to fill in the gaps created by ERISA's preemption provisions. For example, Sen. Javits, one of the Senate's two principal ERISA sponsors, stated the courts may have to look to federal common law to resolve ERISA issues: "It is also intended that a body of Federal substantive law will be developed by the courts to deal with issues involving rights and obligations under private welfare and pension plans."[26]

Senator Williams, the other Senator sponsor, similarly emphasized that suits involving beneficiaries rights "will be regarded as arising under the laws of the United States, in similar fashion to those brought under section 301 of the Labor Management Relations Act."[27]

[23] Retail Clerks v. Schermerhorn, 375 U.S. 96, 103 (1963).

[24] FMC Corp. v. Holliday, 498 U.S. 52, 57 (1990).

[25] 29 U.S.C. §1144(a).

[26] 120 Cong. Rec. 29942 (1974).

[27] Id. at 29933.

ERISA's intentional parallel to the Labor Management Relations Act highlights the Stearns panel error. This Court has specifically found that federal common law must be used in interpreting Labor Management Relations Act:

> The Labor Management Relations Act expressly furnishes some substantive law. It points out what the parties may or may not do in certain situations. Other problems will lie in the penumbra of express statutory mandates. Some will lack express statutory sanction but will be solved by looking at the policy of the legislation and fashioning a remedy that will effectuate that policy. The range of judicial inventiveness will be determined by the nature of the problem.[28]

Consistent with this principle, then, the federal judiciary has recognized the possibility of a promissory estoppel claim within the context of an ERISA plan, even though the statute does not expressly authorize it.[29] So too, there is no reason (and none was given) why a contract that deals with an ERISA plan should not be recognized and enforced.

[28] Textile Workers Union of America v. Lincoln Mills, 353 U.S. 448, 457 (1957).

The Stearns panel simply ignored Congress's intent that federal common law principles must be applied to fill in ERISA's gaps.

III. The Questions Presented Are Important

The significance of the Stearns panel's decision in this case is readily apparent: If a contract claim is recognized and contract principles are applied, then the Trial Court's summary judgment grant in favor of Stearns must be affirmed. But the significance of the Stearns panel's decision far exceeds the outlines of the lawsuit.

[29] E.g., Schonholz v. Long Island Jewish Med. Ctr., 87 F.3d 72, 78-79 (2nd Cir.) cert. denied, 519 U.S. 1008 (1996) (reversing dismissal of promissory estoppel claim under ERISA, relying on RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF CONTRACTS §90(1)); In re New Valley Corp., 89 F.3d 143, 152 (3rd Cir. 1996) cert. denied, 519 U.S. 1110 (1997) ("We have recognized the viability of estoppel claims against ERISA plans in general . . . ."); Kamler v. H/N Telecommunication Services, Inc., 305 F.3d 672, 679 (7th Cir. 2002) ("In attempting to clarify some confusion about estoppel, we held . . . that the elements of ERISA-estoppel are: (1) a knowing misrepresentation by the defendant; (2) in writing; (3) with reasonable reliance by the plaintiff on the misrepresentation; (4) to the plaintiff's detriment."); Slice v. Sons of Norway, 34 F.3d 630, 634 (8th Cir. 1994) ("Estoppel can only be employed 'when the terms of the plan are ambiguous and the communications constituted an interpretation of that ambiguity.' ") (quoting district court) (emphasis in original).

Perhaps most obviously, the Stearns panel's decision dramatically confuses the legal landscape for ERISA practitioners, employers and employees. ERISA is a federal statute, and uniformity is presumed among the circuits.[30] The panel's decision destroys that precept on this fundamental issue.

The confusion is exacerbated by the very nature of multi-national corporations. Many employers - NCR being only one - have employees throughout the United States. The panel's decision, if left uncorrected, would leave employees who reside within the Eighth Circuit with different legal rights than those who reside elsewhere, even where the same documents are at issue.

Unintentionally, the panel's decision provides (1) a blueprint for employers who want to induce employees to retire early through severance agreements enforceable only against the employees and later change the consideration that formed the basis of that agreement and (2) a safe harbor for employers to do so.

The Trial Court clearly understood what was at stake:

> The Court has no confidence that Early Out Program participants understood when they relinquished valuable rights to sue for age discrimination that medical benefits received in return could be slashed unilaterally by [30] Cf., E.E.O.C. v. Northwest Airlines, Inc., 188 F.3d 695, 700 (6th Cir. 1999) ("Federal law is presumed to be uniform, whether or not it is in fact.").

defendant. ERISA should not be read to sanction such actions.[31]

In reaching its conclusion that a contract claim cannot be asserted, the panel had no guidance from the parties. NCR did not preserve this issue on appeal, and thus neither party directed the panel to authority on this subject.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons set forth above, the Petition for a Writ of Certiorari should be granted.

In late 1998, when NCR Corporation announced that it would reduce retirees' health care benefits, Donald W.

Stearns commenced this class action on behalf of former salaried employees who had participated in an early retirement program offered by NCR in the fall of 1993. Following certification of the class, the parties filed cross motions for summary judgment. Plaintiffs asserted that the more generous benefits offered as part of the 1993 early retirement program are vested and unalterable. NCR argued that it reserved the right to modify these benefits in the relevant plan documents. The district court rejected plaintiffs' claims under the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (ERISA), 29 U.S.C. § § 1001 et seq., but granted the class members summary judgment on their claims that NCR breached a separate early retirement contract. Stearns v. NCR Corp., 97 F. Supp. 2d 954 (D. Minn. 2000). NCR appeals, and plaintiffs cross-appeal the district court's denial of their ERISA claims. We review these summary judgment rulings de novo, using the same standard as the district court. Concluding that plaintiffs are not entitled to relief under either theory, we affirm in part and reverse in part.

I. Background.

NCR offered the 1993 Enhanced Retirement Program (the "Program") to salaried employees who were at least fifty years old and had worked for NCR for at least ten years. In exchange for retiring effective January 1, 1994, eligible employees were offered a collage of financial benefits, including a $ 30,000 lump sum payment added to their 1993 salaries, paid vacation time in 1994, pension benefits calculated without a reduction for early retirement, enhanced life insurance coverage, and the benefit at issue in this lawsuit -- eligibility for more favorable retirement health care benefits than were available under NCR's existing retirement health care plans.[1]

When the Program was offered, existing health care benefits for NCR's salaried employees and retirees were defined in a comprehensive document entitled Group Benefits Plan For Salaried Employees Effective January 1, 1993 (hereinafter, the "Group Benefits Plan"). This document was an "employee welfare benefit plan" for purposes of ERISA. See 29 U.S.C. § 1002(1). Part VII of this plan explained the benefits available to retired employees and their spouses. Part I, entitled General Provisions, included Section 12, entitled Other Important Facts, which included the following provision:

> F. PLAN AMENDMENT. The Company reserves all rights at any time or from time to time to amend the Plan in whole or in part . . . . The Company reserves the right to change or cancel the Plan, or any benefits under the Plan, at any time. If the Company cancels the Plan or any benefits under the Plan,

[1] Participants who retired at ages 50-54 would receive NCR's existing "Choice 2 (80/20) Health Care Plan," whereas no retirement health care benefits were previously available to this age group. In addition, all participants retiring before age 65 would receive NCR's Mail Order Prescription Drug Program, previously available only to active employees. Finally, NCR made a "permanent" plan change whereby those not electing to participate who later retired at ages 55-64 would receive Choice 2 (80/20) Health Care coverage, instead of the more generous "OPTION 1 (90/10) Health Care" coverage previously provided.

> participation in the cancelled benefits would end on the date of cancellation.

We will refer to this as the Reservation of Rights provision. It is the principal basis for NCR's contention that the retirement health care benefits at issue are not vested.

After announcing the Program, NCR distributed a Questions and Answers Guide "to provide [eligible employees] with information to assist them as they make decisions relative to the Enhanced Retirement Program." Part IV of this Guide, entitled Post Retirement Health Care Benefits, advised prospective participants to "refer to our 'Group Benefits Plan' booklet which was mailed to your home earlier this year for the details of the NCR Health Care Plans." In addition, NCR described the retirement health care benefits as subject to modification at seminars and broadcasts conducted to explain the Program to prospective participants.

To participate in the Program, an eligible employee had to sign a form entitled Election To Volunteer for the Enhanced Retirement Program and Release of Claims no later than December 17, 1993. This form provided in relevant part:

> After considering my personal situation, I elect to retire under the terms of the Enhanced Retirement Program. I have reviewed and understand the terms of the Program and this Election Form. I understand that by retiring under the Enhanced Retirement Program I am entitled to a package of benefits that exceeds the benefits that I would normally receive. In > exchange for these additional benefits, I acknowledge and agree to the following:

> 5. I release and discharge NCR . . . [from] all claims I have, have ever had, or may now have, for or related in any way to my employment or the end of my employment with NCR . . . . This release does not affect my rights to benefits due under the Enhanced Retirement Program.

Like the district court, we will refer to these forms as the Releases.

After January 1, 1994, when Program participants retired and began receiving retirement benefits, NCR made a number of relatively modest changes to their health care benefits without objection. This dispute arose when NCR notified the Program's early retirees that significant adverse changes would be made to their retirement health care benefits effective January 1, 1999. These changes included a new percentage-of-premiums charge, increased deductibles and co-payments, and elimination of NCR's Medicare supplement plan for retirees over the age of 64. Stearns commenced this action on November 4, 1998, alleging that these changes were unlawful because the class members' retirement health care benefits became vested by virtue of their participation in the Program. As relevant to this appeal, Stearns asserted claims for breach of contract and for enforcement of ERISA plan terms under 29 U.S.C. § 1132(a)(1)(B), the ERISA provision authorizing a plan participant to sue "to recover benefits due to him under the terms of his plan, to enforce his rights under the terms of the plan, or to clarify his rights to future benefits under the terms of the plan."

II. The District Court's Breach of Contract Ruling.

In ruling on the cross motions for summary judgment, the district court first rejected plaintiffs' ERISA plan enforcement claim, concluding that the Program was an amendment to the Group Benefits Plan, not a separate free-standing ERISA plan, and that the Reservation of Rights provision in the Group Benefits Plan applies to NCR retirees "in general." 97 F. Supp. 2d at 961. However, the court then ruled in plaintiffs's favor on their breach of contract claims, concluding that the Releases signed by Program participants formed "independent bilateral contracts" with NCR that must be construed "according to basic principles of contract interpretation." As the Releases failed to reserve expressly the unilateral right to amend or cancel the Program's retirement health care benefits, and did not unambiguously refer to another document containing such a reservation of rights, the Releases must be construed against the party that drafted them, NCR, as impliedly promising vested retirement health care benefits. 97 F. Supp. 2d 961-67.

In our view, by resolving the ERISA claims before analyzing the breach-of-contract issues, the district court put the cart before the horse. Without question, there was a bilateral contract between NCR and each Program participant defining the terms upon which those parties agreed to terminate their employment relationship. The district court mistakenly treated the Releases themselves as the bilateral contracts. They were only part of the contracts, the part signifying an employee's acceptance of NCR's offer of enhanced early retirement benefits. The Releases contained some contract terms, but most of the terms were set forth in the documents which offered the Program to eligible employees. Those documents and the Releases collectively formed the bilateral contracts. However, the critical error in the district court's breach-of-contract analysis was more fundamental than simply misconstruing the nature of the bilateral contracts.

In general, an employment contract between an employer and a non-union employee is governed by state law, not by ERISA or by the federal labor laws. However, to the extent an employment contract provides pension or welfare benefits through a plan or program covered by ERISA, that statute and its remedial provisions completely preempt state law remedies for breach of contract. See, e.g., Lyons v. Philip Morris, Inc., 225 F.3d 909, 912-13 (8th Cir. 2000). Thus, in dealing with a multi-faceted employment contract such as NCR's early retirement Program, some facets may be governed by ERISA (such as the Program's promise of enhanced pension benefits), while others may be governed by state law (such as NCR's promises to pay $ 30,000 in additional salary in 1993 and vacation pay in 1994). If a facet is governed by ERISA, any dispute over the terms of that benefit must be resolved by looking to ERISA's statutory provisions and relevant case law. Claims for ERISA benefits are determined by construing the plan in toto, not a single document such as the Releases in isolation. To be sure, "basic principles of contract interpretation" are often relevant in construing an ERISA plan. But if the plan, properly construed, does not afford the benefits at issue, they may not be added to the plan by implication from an "independent bilateral contract."

In this case, we are concerned with enhanced retirement health care benefits. All parties agree that this facet of the Program is an employee welfare benefit plan. Therefore, plaintiffs' claim that those benefits were vested is governed by ERISA. The claim is of course contractual in nature, but the district court erred in looking beyond ERISA plan interpretation principles by splitting plaintiffs' single ERISA claim into distinct ERISA and breach-of-contract components.[2]

III. The ERISA Claim.

The issue in this case is whether the Program's retirement health care benefits were vested when plaintiffs agreed to participate in the Program. ERISA mandates vested pension benefits. See 29 U.S.C. § 1053. But Congress did not mandate vesting for employee welfare benefit plans, such as health care plans. See 29 U.S.C. § 1051(1); Curtiss-Wright Corp. v. Schoonejongen, 514 U.S. 73, 78, 131 L. Ed. 2d 94, 115 S. Ct. 1223 (1995). "Therefore, an employer may unilaterally modify or terminate medical benefits at any time absent the employer's contractual agreement to the contrary." Jensen v. SIPCO, Inc., 38 F.3d 945, 949 (8th Cir. 1994) (quotation omitted), cert. denied, 514 U.S. 1050, 131 L. Ed. 2d 310, 115 S. Ct. 1428 (1995). Plaintiffs have the burden of proof on the vesting issue. See Hutchins v. Champion Int'l Corp., 110 F.3d 1341, 1345 (8th Cir. 1997).

[2] The district court's bilateral contract analysis relied on dicta in Frahm v. Equitable Life Assurance Soc'y of the U.S., 137 F.3d 955, 957-58 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 525 U.S. 817, 142 L. Ed. 2d 43, 119 S. Ct. 55 (1998), suggesting "that bilateral contracts about welfare benefits are possible." But Judge Easterbrook's opinion in Frahm did not suggest that benefits disputes arising out of bilateral contracts that establish or amend an ERISA plan would not be governed by ERISA plan interpretation principles.

1. A critical threshold issue is to define the contours of the ERISA plan we are construing. NCR argues that the Program's retirement health care benefits were provided as an amendment to NCR's existing Group Benefits Plan, which contained the Reservation of Rights provision. Plaintiffs argue that the Program constituted an independent ERISA plan, separate from the broader Group Benefits Plan and its Reservation of Rights provision, and therefore the relevant plan contains no express reservation of NCR's right to modify or terminate the plan's retirement health care benefits. The district court rejected plaintiffs' contention, concluding that "the documentary evidence offered by the parties in this case makes clear that the . . . Program is not, as plaintiffs contend, a free-standing ERISA plan. Rather, NCR amended the basic health care plan that it provided for its employees at the time of the . . . Program's inception." 97 F. Supp. 2d at 957.

After careful review of the documentary record, we agree with the district court's thorough analysis of this issue. The documents NCR distributed in offering the Program were not sufficient to explain the retirement health care benefits being offered without reference to the detailed benefit provisions in the existing Group Benefits Plan. Indeed, NCR's Question and Answer Guide -- a document plaintiffs cite as strong evidence the Program was a free-standing ERISA plan -- advised employees to "refer to our Group Benefits Plan booklet . . . for the details of the NCR Health Care Plans." In addition, the documents by which NCR formally adopted the Program confirm that it was an amendment to existing employee benefit plans.

2. Concluding that the Program's retirement health care benefits were an amendment to the Group Benefits Pian means that the relevant plan documents included the express Reservation of Rights provision. That is very significant, because "a reservation-of-rights provision is inconsistent with, and in most cases would defeat, a claim of vested benefits." Jensen, 38 F.3d at 950. We have repeatedly held that an unambiguous reservation-of-rights provision is sufficient without more to defeat a claim that retirement welfare plan benefits are vested. See Hughes v. 3M Retiree Medical Plan, 281 F.3d 786, 792-93 (8th Cir. 2002) (reservation of rights provision in plan "devoid of vesting language" defeats vesting claim); United Paperworkers Int'l Union v. Jefferson Smurfit Corp., 961 F.2d 1384, 1385 (8th Cir. 1992) (unambiguous reservation of rights clause and "absolutely nothing in the plan to contradict or cloud [its] plain and obvious meaning" defeats vesting claim); Anderson v. Alpha Portland Indus., Inc. 836 F.2d 1512, 1514, 1519 (8th Cir. 1988) (plan provision that retirement health benefits "may now or hereinafter be amended, modified or supplemented in collective bargaining" inconsistent with vesting), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1051 (1989).

If a reservation-of-rights provision is facially ambiguous, or if it conflicts with other plan provisions, the court in resolving a dispute over vesting may look at extrinsic evidence to determine whether the parties intended to confer vested retirement health care benefits. See Barker v. Ceridian

Corp., 122 F.3d 628, 635-39 (8th Cir. 1997); Jensen, 38 F.3d at 950-52. But there must be an affirmative indication of vesting in the plan documents to overcome an unambiguous reservation of rights. See Hutchins, 110 F.3d at 1345-46 (when plan authorizes employer to terminate or modify it, benefits are not vested "in the absence of contrary language in the plan"). An intent to vest may not be implied from the fact that the Releases and the NCR documents explaining the Program did not address the vesting issue or cross-reference the Reservation of Rights provision. Indeed, not even the ERISA-mandated summary plan description need disclose that welfare plan benefits are not vested. See Hughes, 281 F.3d at 792; Jensen, 38 F.3d at 952. Thus, under our well-established principles of ERISA plan interpretation,[3] the district court properly granted summary judgment in favor of NCR dismissing plaintiffs' ERISA plan enforcement claims. Because plaintiffs have no separate breach-of-contract claims, this ends the case.

The judgment of the district court is reversed. The case is remanded with directions to dismiss plaintiffs' complaint with prejudice and to disburse the Escrow Funds to

[3] Other circuits similarly require clear expressions of an intent to vest welfare plan benefits and enforce unambiguous reservation-of-rights provisions. See Int'l Union, UAW v. Skinner Engine Co., 188 F.3d 130, 139 (3rd Cir. 1999); Joyce v. Curtiss-Wright Corp., 171 F.3d 130, 135-36 (2d Cir. 1999); Sprague v. General Motors Corp., 133 F.3d 388, 400 (6th Cir.) MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER ON CROSS-MOTIONS FOR SUMMARY JUDGMENT

This is a class-action lawsuit brought by former employees of defendant NCR Corporation ("NCR") under the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (codified as amended at 29 U.S.C. § § 1001-1461 (1994 & Supp. III 1997) and in scattered sections of Title 26 U.S.C.) ("ERISA"), to restore retirement benefits under an early retirement program offered by NCR and administered by defendant NCR Pre-65 Retiree Health Care Plan. This Court granted plaintiffs' motion to certify the class, represented by Donald W. Stearns ("Stearns"), on September 17, 1999.

Plaintiffs' complaint states three separate counts against defendants, including a claim for ERISA plan enforcement under 29 U.S.C. § 1132(a)(1)(B), a claim for breach of contract under the "federal common law" and 29 U.S.C. § 1132(a)(1)(B), and a claim for breach of fiduciary duty under 29 U.S.C. § § 1132(a)(3) and 1109(a). This matter is before the Court on the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment. Defendants seek dismissal of all of plaintiffs' claims in their entirety. Plaintiffs seek summary judgment on the issue of liability only, with damages to be determined later. For the reasons stated herein, both motions are granted in part and denied in part.

BACKGROUND

Few facts, if any, are in dispute. In 1993, NCR sought to reduce the size of its workforce in the United States by implementing a series of incentive programs in order to encourage employees to agree to either early retirement or voluntary separation from the company. The first of these programs offered enhanced retirement benefits to employees otherwise eligible for retirement benefits who were fifty years old or older, had at least ten years of service with the company, and who filed an election to retire during a short window of time between November 1 through December 17, 1993 (the "Early Out Program"). All retirements falling under the program became effective as of January 1, 1994. Plaintiffs' class consists of those NCR retirees who opted to retire early under the terms of the Early Out Program.[1]

Benefits offered to retirees under the program included a lump sum payment of $ 30,000, enhanced pension benefits (calculated without reduction for early retirement), and health insurance coverage at optimum levels to which they otherwise would not be entitled. In exchange, defendants required all retirees participating in the Early Out Program to sign statements of intent to retire and to release all potential legal claims arising out of their employment, including discrimination on the basis of age (the "Releases").

In September 1998, defendants notified all of NCR's retirees, including participants in the Early Out Program, of adverse changes to their health care benefits effective January 1, 1999. These changes required retirees to pay a percentage of their health care premiums, which NCR formerly covered in their entirety. The changes also required retirees to pay increased deductibles and co-payments, and eliminated benefits to retirees over the age of 64 which were formerly offered under NCR's Medicare supplement plan. Plaintiffs filed this action contesting the proposed amendments on November 4, 1998.

[1] NCR later offered a "Voluntary Separation Program," under which NCR gave employees the opportunity to terminate their employment voluntarily in exchange for certain enumerated benefits. The terms of the Voluntary Separation Program generally were less favorable than those available to participants in the Early Out Program.

STANDARD OF REVIEW

Rule 56 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure governs motions for summary judgment, stating in pertinent part:

> [Summary] judgment shall be rendered forthwith if the pleadings, depositions, answers to interrogatories, and admissions on file, together with the affidavits, if any, show that there is no genuine issue as to any material fact and that the moving party is entitled to a judgment as a matter of law.

Fed. R. Civ. P. 56(c). Summary judgment is to be granted only when the evidence is such that no reasonable jury could return a verdict for the non-moving party. See Anderson v. Liberty Lobby, Inc., 477 U.S. 242, 250, 91 L. Ed. 2d 202, 106 S. Ct. 2505 (1986).

Initially, the movant bears the burden of bringing forward sufficient evidence to establish that there are no genuine issues of material fact and that the movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law. See Celotex Corp. v. Catrett, 477 U.S. 317, 322, 91 L. Ed. 2d 265, 106 S. Ct. 2548 (1986). In evaluating the movant's showing, the evidence offered by the non-moving party is to be believed and all justifiable inferences arising therefrom are to be drawn in the light most favorable to that party. See Matsushita Elec. Indus. v. Zenith Radio, 475 U.S. 574, 587, 89 L. Ed. 2d 538, 106 S. Ct. 1348 (1986). When a moving party makes and supports a motion for summary judgment in accordance with Rule 56, a party opposing the motion may not rest upon the allegations or denials of its pleadings; rather, that party must "set forth specific facts showing that there is a genuine issue for trial." Liberty Lobby, 477 U.S. at 256; Krenik v. County of Le Sueur, 47 F.3d 953, 957 (8th Cir. 1995). Accordingly, the nonmovant "must make a sufficient showing on every essential element of its case for which it has the burden of proof at trial." Wilson v. Southwestern Bell Tel. Co., 55 F.3d 399, 405 (8th Cir. 1995).

Summary judgment is particularly appropriate in cases such as this one, in which few facts are in dispute. Moreover, by filing cross-motions for summary judgment the parties appear to concede that the unresolved issues are issues of law rather than issues of fact.

I. Plan Enforcement Claim

Although complicated by a number of smaller issues, the parties' underlying positions in this matter are relatively simple. Defendants contend that plaintiffs' entitlement to health insurance under the Early Out Program was limited by a disclaimer notifying all of its employees that medical benefits were subject to amendment or termination by NCR. Plaintiffs argue that, unlike other retirees, they struck a bargain with NCR under the terms of which they are entitled to vested medical benefits. They contend that the asserted disclaimer does not apply to them because the Early Out Program constitutes an independent ERISA plan that is separate from the general NCR health care plan in which the disclaimer is located. They alternatively argue that, even if the Early Out Program is part of NCR's general health care plan, the disclaimer contained therein applies only to active employees and not to retirees.

A. Status of the Early Out Program as an amendment to the existing plan

The documentary evidence offered by the parties in this case makes clear that the Early Out Program is not, as plaintiffs contend, a free-standing ERISA plan. Rather, NCR amended the basic health care plan that it provided for its employees at the time of the Early Out Program's inception (the "1993 Plan"), to provide enhanced coverage to early retirees under the program.

NCR distributed copies of the official plan document and summary plan description ("SPD") for that plan, entitled "1993 Group Benefits Plan for Salaried Employees," several months before announcing the Early Out Program. NCR first announced the Early Out Program on October 1, 1993, in a special newsletter to employees from Jerre Stead, an NCR Vice President. This newsletter generally outlined the program's eligibility requirements and stated that more detailed information concerning the program would be forthcoming.

NCR thereafter sent two separate memoranda dated October 6, 1993 to employees who were eligible for participation in the Early Out Program. These memoranda, although executed by two different NCR Assistant Vice Presidents and sent to two separate groups of employees, contained substantially the same information about the program. Each described a variety of "permanent plan amendments" to the 1993 Plan, which NCR expressed an intent to implement beginning January 1, 1994 for retirees who did not opt to participate in the Early Out Program. The memoranda further compared the coverage available to retirees under the "permanent plan amendments" with the coverage to which Early Out Program participants would be entitled.

Plaintiffs contend that by distinguishing its proposed "permanent plan amendments" from the terms of the Early Out Program, defendants acknowledged that the terms of that program were something other than amendments to the 1993 Plan. The Court disagrees. Defendants' use of the phrase "permanent plan amendments" in contrast with the Early Out Program terms merely suggests that the Early Out Program was not "permanent," in the sense that employees could only enroll in it during a very brief window of time. It does not suggest, as plaintiffs contend, that the Early Out Program was a free-standing ERISA Plan.

Importantly, the October 6 memoranda described the pension and health care benefits to which Early Out Program participants would be entitled as "Choice 2 (80/20) Health Care," "Option 1 (90/20) Health Care" or the "Supplemental Plan to Medicare," depending on the age of the individual retiree. These terms, standing alone, are not descriptive of the benefits to which Early Out Program participants would be entitled. An employee reading the memoranda in isolation would not understand the scope of his or her coverage, but would need to refer to some other document for a more complete description of the benefits offered under the program.

Plaintiffs argue that NCR provided such a description in a document sent to employees along with the memoranda entitled "1993 U.S. Group Enhanced Retirement Program Questions and Answers Guide," (the "Q&A Guide"). The Q&A Guide contains as an attachment a very thorough description of the benefits offered under "Option 1," "Choice 2" and the "Supplemental Plan for Medicare," defining everything from deductibles, co-payments, and out-of-pocket maximums to the degree of coverage offered for specifically enumerated medical, dental, and mental health services.

Plaintiffs point to the high degree of specificity contained in the attachment to the Q&A Guide and argue that this document, along with the October 6 memoranda and the Releases signed by participants in the program, constitute both the official plan documents and the SPD for a separate and independent ERISA plan.

This argument is undermined by language contained in the Q&A Guide that describes the attachment at issue as a mere summary and plainly refers Early Out Program participants to the 1993 Plan booklet for a description of the benefits offered. Under the subheading "Post Retirement Health Care Benefits," the Q&A Guide states, "A summary of each of the NCR retiree health care plans (Choice 2, Option 1, and the Supplemental Plan to Medicare) is attached for your reference. Your (sic) should refer to our "Group Benefits Plan" booklet which was mailed to your home earlier this year for the details of the NCR Health Care Plans" (emphasis in the original). Thus, the Q&A Guide does not itself purport to establish an independent plan, but rather, defines the benefits offered to participants within the text of the official plan document for the 1993 Plan.[2]

Other evidence in the record confirms that the Early Out Program does not constitute a separate ERISA plan. Defendants have submitted documents demonstrating that the members of NCR's Board of Directors executed various resolutions on December 13, 1993. One of these resolutions authorized NCR's ERISA Plan Administrator to implement various amendments to the 1993 Plan described in an attachment to the resolutions. This attachment includes a proposal to amend the 1993 Plan to incorporate the terms of the Early Out Program. This evidence shows that NCR had [2] Plaintiffs contend that the Q&A Guide's reference to the 1993 Plan description is nonsensical, because that document contains no information about a plan entitled "Option 1." Nevertheless, the attachment to the Q&A Guide refers to the "Option 1" plan as synonymous with "Choice 1," a plan which the 1993 Plan description sets forth in a significant amount of detail. In light of these facts, the Q&A Guide's reference to the 1993 Plan description is consistent with information contained therein.

no intent upon implementing the Early Out Program to establish an independent ERISA plan, but rather, only to amend the plan that was already in existence.

Plaintiffs argue that although the NCR Board of Directors authorized the Plan Administrator to amend the 1993 Plan, he or she never exercised that authority. Nevertheless, defendants have submitted a document entitled "Group Benefits Plans - Amendments to the Summary Plan Descriptions," which contradicts plaintiffs' position. This document contains, inter alia, a written amendment to the 1993 Plan SPD to incorporate the terms of the Early Out Program.[3] Its existence belies any contention on the part of plaintiffs that the Plan Administrator failed to exercise his or her authority to amend the 1993 Plan. It further eliminates

[3] At first blush the relevance of this document to the case at bar is somewhat unclear, because it refers to a company entitled "AT&T Global Solutions Company" rather than "NCR." Moreover, it contains no reference to NCR's 1993 Plan description, the booklet entitled "Group Benefits Plan for Salaried Employees." Nevertheless, the record reflects that NCR changed its name to "AT&T Global Solutions Company" beginning in January 1994 and continuing for a few years thereafter. Thus, the amendments set forth in the document constitute amendments to NCR employee benefit plans. Furthermore, the document amends NCR plan number 502, entitled therein as "Group Benefit Plan for Management Employees of NCR Corporation." The December 13, 1993 NCR Board Resolutions make clear that plan number 502 and the "Group Benefits Plan for Salaried Employees" are one and the same. Therefore, although the paper trail is difficult to follow, the amendments described in the document at issue constitute amendments to the 1993 Plan SPD.

any possible doubt that defendants incorporated the terms of the Early Out Program into the 1993 Plan as an amendment, rather than establishing the program as an independent plan.

In light of this evidence, including the 1993 Plan SPD amendments, the NCR Board of Directors resolutions, and the above-quoted Q&A Guide language, the Court is compelled to find that the 1993 Plan was amended to incorporate the terms of the Early Out Program. Its asserted status as an independent ERISA Plan, therefore, does not permit plaintiffs to avoid the effects of the 1993 Plan disclaimer.

B. Application of the 1993 Plan disclaimer to retirees

Plaintiffs' argument that the 1993 Plan disclaimer does not apply to retirees is also without merit. The disclaimer at issue is contained under the heading, "Part I: General Provisions," and under the subheading, "Section 12: Other Important Facts." It states, in relevant part, as follows:

> The Company reserves the right at any time or from time to time to amend the Plan in whole or in part . . . . No retroactive amendment shall be made unless required under ERISA, any other Federal law or under any applicable regulations thereunder. The Company reserves the right to change or cancel the Plan, or any benefits under the Plan, at any time. If the Company cancels the Plan or any benefits under the Plan, participation in the cancelled benefits would end on the date of cancellation.

Plaintiffs point to the definitions outlined in Section 1 of the General Provisions, which make clear that the term "Plan" as it is used throughout the 1993 Plan description is distinct from the term "Retirement Plan." They assume that retiree health care benefits fall within the scope of NCR's Retirement Plan, and on that basis argue that because the disclaimer omits any mention of the Retirement Plan it does not apply to them.

The assumption upon which plaintiffs' argument rests is erroneous. A review of the 1993 Plan booklet demonstrates that retiree health care benefits are not a part of NCR's "Retirement Plan," but rather, are a part of the 1993 Plan described therein. For example, the 1993 Plan booklet states that retirees may be eligible for the health care and life insurance benefits described in Part VII of the booklet if they "begin[] to draw a monthly pension benefit under the Retirement Plan." Thus, while the 1993 Plan provides health care, disability, life insurance and other welfare benefits to both active employees and retirees, NCR's Retirement Plan is an employee pension benefit plan.

Plaintiffs also contend that NCR is precluded from modifying retiree health care benefits because the disclaimer states that "no retroactive amendment shall be made" to the 1993 Plan. They interpret the phrase "retroactive amendment" to refer to any modification or termination of employee benefits that have already vested. Plaintiffs construe this clause only to prohibit amendment to retiree health care benefits after retirement, and not to prohibit modifications to the benefits offered to active employees.[4] In so doing, they rely upon the implicit assumption that employee medical benefits vest at the time of retirement.

Defendants contest plaintiffs' interpretation, arguing that by including this clause in its disclaimer provision NCR intended merely to proscribe amendments that might retroactively diminish the rights of employees whose particular insurance claims had already been filed. Under defendants' construction NCR would be prohibited, for example, from enacting an amendment in May that would take effect the preceding March and thus affect the claims of an employee who sought health care in April.

The Court finds that the precise meaning of the retroactivity clause is somewhat ambiguous, although defendants' interpretation is the simplest and most plausible one. Courts generally interpret ERISA plan documents according to trust law principles under which the employer or plan provider stands in the shoes of the settlor, the plan administrator the trustee, and the employee the beneficiary. See Barker v. Ceridian Corp., 193 F.3d 976, 979 (8th Cir. 1999). Under these principles, when a term of the trust instrument is ambiguous courts may look to extrinsic evidence in order to determine the intent of the settlor. See Jensen v. SIPCO, Inc., 38 F.3d 945, 950 (8th Cir. 1994).

[4] A more broad interpretation of this clause as prohibiting amendment to both active and retired employee benefits would, of course, nullify the entire reservation of rights provision and require NCR to provide all 1993 Plan participants with vested health care benefits.

In this instance, although the Court finds ambiguity in the retroactivity clause at issue, reliance upon extrinsic evidence is unnecessary because this ambiguity is not so great as to permit plaintiffs' proposed construction. Plaintiffs' interpretation restricts the scope of the retroactivity clause in a manner that is unsupported by the plain language of the document. Its location within the "General Provisions" section of the 1993 Plan booklet and within a subsection pertaining generally to the entire 1993 Plan demonstrates that the retroactivity clause applies to all plan provisions, including those applicable to both active and retired employees. Plaintiffs' construction reads into the clause a limitation to retirees that plainly does not exist. Moreover, even accepting plaintiffs' interpretation to be permissible, they have offered no extrinsic evidence from which the Court might conclude that NCR intended to provide retirees with vested medical benefits. They have for these reasons failed to meet their burden of proving that NCR provided retirees with vested medical benefits by including the retroactivity clause within its general reservation of rights provision. See Howe v. Varity Corp., 896 F.2d 1107, 1109 (8th Cir. 1990) ("Plaintiffs have the burden of proving vested welfare benefits.").

In support of their position plaintiffs rely on language found in the Eighth Circuit's opinion in Jensen, 38 F.3d at 951-52, for the proposition that in ERISA cases a "retroactive amendment" means an amendment to retiree benefits. The text upon which plaintiffs rely states:

> To put the issue in trust law terms, either the reservation-of-rights provisions in the plan > documents must be construed as conferring only a power to modify plan benefits prospectively (that is, for salaried employees not yet retired), or SIPCO relinquished the broader power to modify benefits for those already retired.

Id.

Plaintiffs note that in this paragraph the Eighth Circuit used the term "prospectively" to refer to an amendment affecting only active employees. From this observation they jump wildly to the conclusion that whenever an ERISA plan document uses the term "retroactive" it pertains to an amendment affecting retiree health care benefits, regardless of the context in which that term is used. The Court does not agree that the text of Jensen may be read so broadly as to support the rule that plaintiffs advocate. Rather, it appears that the Jensen court merely used the term "prospectively" as a short-hand means of conveying, for the purpose of that particular opinion, the concept of amendment to active employee benefits. Jensen does not purport to set forth an inviolable rule of ERISA plan construction with regard to the use of that term.[5]

[5] The Court observes that Jensen is distinguishable from the case at bar on several grounds. First, the reservation of rights provision in that case contained a proviso stating, "Unless otherwise expressly provided therein, amendments [to the company's pensioner medical plan] shall not be applicable to persons who are receiving pensions." Jensen, 38 F.3d at 949. The court reasoned that this language left "some doubt" as to whether

For these reasons, the Court concludes that neither the text of the disclaimer provision nor the extrinsic evidence supports plaintiffs' contention that the retroactivity clause prohibits NCR from modifying retiree medical benefits. Plaintiffs have therefore failed to support their claim that the disclaimer provision does not apply to NCR retirees in general.

II. Breach of Contract Claim

Although the Court finds that the Early Out Program constitutes an amendment to the 1993 Plan, and that the 1993 Plan disclaimer applies generally to NCR retirees, these findings do not conclude the Court's inquiry. As an alternative basis for their claims plaintiffs contend that, unlike other NCR retirees, they have executed bilateral contracts with NCR pursuant to which it is obligated to provide them with vested health care benefits. They seek enforcement of these contracts under ERISA, 29 U.S.C. § 1132(a)(1)(B), and under federal common law.

ERISA divides employee benefit plans into two separate categories, namely, pension plans and welfare plans. See Anderson v. Alpha Portland Indus., Inc., 836 F.2d 1512, the company intended to reserve the right to modify benefits for persons who were already retired. Id. at 950. In this case, the disclaimer at issue does not give rise to similar doubts. Moreover, the court in Jensen premised its findings on "overwhelming extrinsic evidence" that the company intended that retiree medical benefits would vest upon retirement. In the case at bar, no such evidence has been offered.

1516 (8th Cir. 1988). While pension plans establish retirement income for employees, see id., welfare plans provide almost any other kind of fringe benefit, including medical benefits, disability benefits, life insurance, vacation pay, and other forms of non-wage compensation, see id.; Frahm v. Equitable Life Assurance Soc'y, 137 F.3d 955, 957 (7th Cir. 1998). Importantly, although ERISA subjects pension plans to stringent vesting requirements, it exempts welfare plans from those same requirements. See Anderson, 836 F.2d at 1516 (citing 29 U.S.C. § § 1053, 1051). Thus, "welfare benefit plans may be modified or terminated absent the employer's contractual agreement to the contrary." Howe, 896 F.2d at 1109. This rule applies to health care plans covering retirees as well as those covering active employees. See id. at 1109-10. Moreover, the Eighth Circuit has held that an employer's mere statement that medical benefits will "continue in retirement" or "until the death of the retiree" does not give rise to a presumption that the benefits vest for life upon retirement. See id.

Nevertheless, courts recognize that an employer may relinquish its freedom not to vest medical benefits if it chooses to do so. See, e.g., Inter-Modal Rail Employees Ass'n v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Ry. Co., 520 U.S. 510, 515-16, 137 L. Ed. 2d 763, 117 S. Ct. 1513 (1997). To be enforceable an employer's promise to provide vested benefits "must be reduced to writing and incorporated, in some fashion, into the formal written ERISA plan." United Paperworks Int'l Union v. Jefferson Smurfit Corp., 961 F.2d 1384, 1386 (8th Cir. 1992).

In the case at bar the parties entered into an agreement pursuant to which plaintiffs waived potential legal claims against NCR and elected early retirement in exchange for severance pay, enhanced pension benefits, and enhanced medical benefits. Whether this agreement prohibits defendants from modifying the terms of plaintiffs' enhanced medical benefits depends first, on whether it is enforceable under the terms of the ERISA plan, and second, on whether it promises vested medical benefits.

The Eighth Circuit has not yet addressed whether a bilateral contract for vested medical benefits is enforceable under ERISA in the context of an early retirement inducement program. Nevertheless, it has recognized that employers and employees may contract for such benefits in the context of a collective bargaining agreement. See United Paperworks, 961 F.2d at 1386. Thus, the general notion that a bilateral agreement between employer and employee for ERISA welfare benefits may be enforceable under appropriate circumstances is recognized under the law of this circuit. Other circuits also support this notion. In Frahm, 137 F.3d at 957, Judge Easterbrook of the Seventh Circuit observed that no theoretical basis exists for declining to enforce individualized agreements pertaining to health care benefits when such agreements are properly formed and documented:

> The [defendant] denies that a personal agreement is possible, but we see no reason in principle why not. . . . Bilateral agreements on the length of vacation and amount of severance pay are common, and if these are proper then bilateral agreements about health care also > must be proper. A firm could award severance pay equal to the expected difference between the firm's medical plan and full coverage, leaving the employee to buy a policy covering the gap. If this is proper, what's wrong with a promise to provide medical care in kind?

Id. The Court finds these arguments persuasive, and agrees that individualized bilateral contracts for ERISA welfare benefits generally are enforceable.

Nonetheless, courts addressing claims for enforcement of such contracts disagree about the requirements they must meet in order to permit recovery of the ERISA welfare benefits promised therein. In Sprague v. General Motors Corp., 133 F.3d 388, 402-03 (6th Cir. 1998) (en banc), the Sixth Circuit addressed factual circumstances nearly identical to those present in the case at bar. There, as in this case, employees who participated in the defendant's early retirement incentive program sought damages based on the defendant's decision to modify the health care benefits initially promised to them under that program. See id. at 394-95. In exchange for these benefits the defendant required many of them to sign statements electing voluntary early retirement, and in some cases, waiving any potential claims for discrimination or other wrongful discharge. See id. Rejecting the plaintiffs' argument that these statements created binding contracts for vested medical benefits, the court held that they were unenforceable because they did not profess to be formal ERISA plan amendments and were not themselves independent ERISA plans. See id. at 402-03. The court reasoned that ERISA requires every plan to be in writing so that employees may determine their rights and obligations upon examining the plan documents, see id. at 402, and concluded that, "altering a welfare plan on the basis of non-plan documents and communications, absent a particularized showing of conduct tantamount to fraud, would undermine ERISA," id. at 403. Thus, under Sprague, agreements such as those at issue in this case are not enforceable unless the agreements themselves constitute formal amendments to the ERISA plan.

The Court respectfully disagrees with the decision in Sprague. No fewer than five judges dissented from the majority opinion in that case on this issue. The dissenting judges emphasized that the early retirees, unlike other employees, gave up significant rights in exchange for the benefits promised to them. See id. at 406-07, 413. Thus, in seeking to enforce the terms of the early retirement program they were not merely attempting to hold their employer to the terms of a gratuitous promise set forth outside the ERISA plan documents, but instead were seeking to enforce the terms of an independent bargain supported by substantial consideration. The Sprague majority failed even to acknowledge this important distinction. The result in Sprague shields employers from their obligations under their own contracts, regardless of the sacrifices made in exchange for them, when said contracts do not themselves purport to be amendments to the formal ERISA plan documents. Since employers control the content of the ERISA plan documents, the Sprague decision in effect gives them carte blanche license to offer inducements to employees to waive their rights and then to renege on their promises after the employees have irrevocably done so. Nothing in ERISA requires courts to sanction such an unfair result.

In so holding, the Court does not intend to suggest that extra-ERISA plan contracts for health care benefits are enforceable regardless of form. In Fram, 137 F.3d at 958, the court recognized that such contracts must be true contracts supported by adequate consideration. Moreover, citing ERISA's requirement that all employee benefit plans be in writing, see 29 U.S.C. § 1102(a); Curtiss-Wright Corp. v. Schoonejongen, 514 U.S. 73, 83, 131 L. Ed. 2d 94, 115 S. Ct. 1223 (1995), the court further reasoned that this requirement logically should extend to all long-term commitments pertaining to employee benefits. See Fram, 137 F.3d at 958 ("The utility of reducing retirement promises to writing and avoiding arguments about who said what to whom are so fundamental to both ERISA and contract law that an extension of the writing requirement to all long-term commitments is an inescapable ingredient of the federal common law slowly accumulating in ERISA's shadow."). Furthermore, the Eighth Circuit has indicated that, in addition to a writing requirement, an additional requirement exists such that no bilateral contract for health care benefits is enforceable unless "incorporated, in some fashion, into the formal written ERISA plan." United Paperworks, 961 F.2d at 1386.[6]

[6] The bar established in United Paperworks appears to be much lower than that set forth in Sprague. While the Sprague court held no bilateral contract to be enforceable unless the contract itself constitutes a formal plan document, United Paperworks acknowledges that, at least in the context of collective bargaining

The Releases at issue in this case meet the requirements set forth in Fram and in United Paperworks. Defendants required each of the plaintiffs in the class to sign the Releases, entitled "Election to Volunteer for the Enhanced Retirement Program and Release of Claims," in order to participate in the Early Out Program. Each of these documents was signed by both the individual plaintiff and an NCR human resources representative, and sets forth each plaintiff's intent to retire under the program and to release his or her employment claims against NCR in exchange for "a package of benefits that exceeds the benefits that [the employee] would normally receive."[7] The Releases thus constitute agreements that are in writing, signed, and supported by consideration. They therefore meet the requirements of written bilateral contracts.

Moreover, NCR's formal amendments to the 1993 Plan SPD establishing the Early Out Program arguably incorporate the terms of the Releases into the 1993 Plan. The amendments state that, as a qualification for participation in the Early Out Program, employees must have "submitted an application for retirement benefits between November 1 and agreements, such contracts may be enforceable if merely "incorporated, in some fashion" into the written plan.

[7] Although the Releases themselves do not set forth the precise terms of the Early Out Progam, these details are documented in writing in the various memoranda and other communications that NCR sent to plaintiffs prior to their enrollment in the program. These memoranda constitute extrinsic evidence of the contracting parties' intent.

December 17, 1993." The amendments do not otherwise clarify what kind of an "application for retirement benefits" an employee must submit in order to participate in the Early Out Program, and as a result, the meaning of this provision is ambiguous. As noted supra, courts may consider extrinsic evidence when interpreting the provisions of an ERISA plan that is ambiguous. See Jensen, 38 F.3d at 950.

In this case, the extrinsic evidence overwhelmingly demonstrates that defendants required employees to sign the Releases in order to participate in the Early Out Program. Such evidence includes an October 27, 1993 letter to potential Early Out Program Participants from an NCR Vice President stating that the election form initially introduced for participation in the program had been revised to include a release of potential employment claims. This letter included as attachments both a copy of the Release, and a document entitled "Questions and Answers about Revised Election Form." In response to a question about whether employees could enroll in the Early Out Program without signing the Release, NCR answered, "No. Signing the release is a requirement for receiving the enhanced benefits." The record contains no evidence whatsoever of any other release, contract, application or other document required by NCR from employees who wished to participate in the program. Thus, the Release signed by each participant and the "application for retirement benefits" referenced in the 1993 Plan amendments appear to be synonymous. Stated another way, the Court concludes that NCR's intent was to amend the 1993 Plan to incorporate the terms of the Early Out Program and to require, among other things, that participants sign the Releases in order to participate in the program. Moreover, because the executed Releases are a requirement for participation in the Early Out Program that is explicitly set forth in the 1993 Plan amendments, the Court further concludes that the amendments incorporate the terms of the Releases into the terms of the 1993 Plan. Thus, although the Releases themselves are not formal ERISA plan documents, they are in writing and "incorporated, in some fashion, into the formal written ERISA plan." United Paperworks, 961 F.2d at 1386. On these grounds in the context of an early retirement incentive, the Court holds that the terms of the Releases, including the promise of enhanced benefits, are enforceable under the federal common law governing ERISA.

In order to prevail on their breach of contract claims, plaintiffs must also demonstrate that under the terms of the Releases they are entitled to enhanced medical benefits that vested on the date of their retirement. Because the Releases constitute independent bilateral contracts between the parties, the Court interprets them as it would any other contract according to basic principles of contract interpretation. Applying these principles, the Court finds that the Releases conferred upon plaintiffs an entitlement to vested medical benefits.

Defendants notably excluded any mention of the disclaimer from the Releases themselves. Generally, when a contract lacks any enumerated contingencies, the consideration promised under that contract is not subject to unilateral amendment. Thus, under a plain reading of the contract language defendants are obligated to provide plaintiffs with the "enhanced benefits" referenced therein. They now seek to avoid that obligation even though plaintiff's have irrevocably performed their obligations under the contract by retiring and releasing all potential claims arising from their employment.

Defendants point out that the Releases do not themselves describe the enhanced benefits to which Early Out Program participants are entitled, but rather, the Court must look to the communications about the program from NCR to its employees in order to ascertain the parties' intent. These communications, in turn, refer employees to the 1993 Plan booklet for a precise description of the benefits available under the "Option 1," "Choice 2," and "Supplement to Medicare" plans. Based on these facts, defendants take the position that the disclaimer contained in the booklet applies to all benefits described therein, including those available to participants in the Early Out Program under the enumerated medical plans. Thus, under defendants' interpretation of the Releases, the enhanced benefits for which plaintiffs contracted are subject to amendment or termination under the 1993 Plan disclaimer.

The Court does not find these arguments to be persuasive. At most, they demonstrate an ambiguity in the contract as to whether the benefits conferred upon plaintiffs are vested. For the above reasons the Court finds that the Early Out Program constitutes an amendment to the 1993 Plan. By definition this amendment changed the Plan terms, and therefore, not all limitations set forth in the 1993 Plan booklet apply to program participants.[8] Which limitations apply to the enhanced benefits and which limitations do not apply is unclear. In order to understand that the disclaimer applied, Early Out Program participants would have had to refer to the entire 1993 Plan booklet and surmise indirectly that the disclaimer extended to the enhanced benefits promised under the contract simply because basic descriptions of the "Option 1," "Choice 2," and the "Supplement to Medicare" plans are outlined in the same booklet. Most plan participants, unschooled in intricacies of the law, would not reach this understanding based on the language contained in the releases. Plan participants who were otherwise aware of the disclaimer would reasonably believe it to be a general limitation on benefits that did not apply to them because, unlike other employees, they gave valuable consideration to defendants in exchange for their benefits.

Thus, contrary to defendants' suggestion, the 1993 Plan disclaimer does not clearly apply to the Releases upon which plaintiffs base their breach of contract claim. To the extent that the Releases are ambiguous, general principles of contract construction require the Court to interpret such ambiguity against defendants. See Restatement (Second) of Contracts § 206 (stating the rule of contra proferentum, that ambiguities in a contract generally are construed against the drafter).

[8] For example, retirees in the 55 to 61 age bracket were not entitled to Option 1/Choice 1 health care coverage under the terms of the 1993 Plan prior to its amendment. Under the amended plan, however, participants in the Early Out Program within this age bracket are entitled to such coverage.

Defendants nevertheless point to extrinsic evidence in the record showing that NCR encouraged potential Early Out Program participants to attend various seminars and satellite broadcasts during which NCR informed employees that it reserved the right to amend or terminate the health care benefits promised to them under the program. They suggest that plan participants therefore should have known that the promised health care benefits were subject to its reservation of rights when they elected to retire.

This evidence does not persuade the Court that plaintiffs reasonably should have known that their health care benefits were subject to modification. Attendance at the seminars and satellite broadcasts upon which defendants rely was clearly voluntary, and defendants otherwise made no effort to ensure that Early Out Program participants understood that it could change or terminate their promised benefits unilaterally at any time. Thus, participants who did not attend the voluntary information sessions had little reason to believe that their medical benefits were not vested. Moreover, even participants who attended these sessions may have missed defendants' critical disclosures because the disclosures were made orally and without written confirmation.[9] Lacking evidence of any clear and

[9] Defendants point to two written documents which they claim informed potential Early Out Program participants that their proposed medical benefits would not vest. These documents include a seminar hand-out that states, "Post Retirement Medical: The intentions (sic) is not to create a benefit that did not previously exist. Plans without post retirement medical would maintain same status. Plans with low level (Plan B) would maintain same status."

unambiguous communication to all Early Out Program participants that their health care benefits were subject to modification, the Court finds that they had a reasonable expectation under the contracts they signed that the enhanced medical benefits promised to them were vested. For these reasons, the Court construes the Releases as bilateral contracts for vested medical benefits. The Court further finds that these contracts are incorporated into the 1993 Plan and enforceable under it. The Court has no confidence that Early Out Program participants understood when they relinquished valuable rights to sue for age discrimination that medical benefits received in return could be slashed unilaterally by defendant. ERISA should not be read to sanction such actions. Plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment on this claim is granted accordingly.

III. Breach of Fiduciary Duty Claim

In addition to their plan enforcement and breach of contract claims, plaintiffs also assert alternatively that defendants breached their fiduciary duties under ERISA, 29

This statement appears to address program eligibility for employees who otherwise were not entitled to benefits under the 1993 Plan, and does not relate to the vesting of benefits. At best this statement is too vague and ambiguous to clearly notify plaintiffs of NCR's purported reservation of rights. Defendants also point to a December 15, 1993 newsletter that NCR sent to its employees. This newsletter states that NCR could not guarantee that "the health care plan for active associates and retirees" would not change. This statement appears to be a general reservation of NCR's right to amend the 1993 Plan provisions, and does not specifically address the entitlement of Early Out Program retirees to vested benefits.

U.S.C. § § 1132(a)(3) and 1109(a), by failing properly to advise plaintiffs that their medical benefits under the Early Out Program did not vest. Because the Court finds that plaintiffs' medical benefits vested, this alternative argument fails.

ORDER

Based on the foregoing, and all of the records, files and proceedings herein, IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that:

1. Defendants' cross-motion for summary judgment [Docket No. 46] is GRANTED in part and DENIED in part.

2. Counts I (ERISA Plan Enforcement) and III (Breach of Fiduciary Duty) of plaintiffs' complaint are DISMISSED, with prejudice.

3. Defendants' cross-motion for summary judgment is denied in all other respects.

4. Plaintiffs' cross-motion for summary judgment [Docket No. 56] is GRANTED in part and DENIED in part.

5. The Court hereby DECLARES that defendants are liable under Count II of plaintiffs' complaint (Breach of Contract).

6. Plaintiffs' cross-motion for summary judgment is denied in all other respects.

QUESTIONS ACTUALLY PRESENTED

1. Did the Court of Appeals correctly hold that the early retirement program offered by NCR Corporation was not a separate plan under the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 ("ERISA") but instead was incorporated by amendment into NCR's general health-care plan?

2. Did the Court of Appeals correctly hold that the contract between each early retiree and NCR included the relevant provisions of NCR's general health-care plan including its reservation of the right to amend or terminate any benefit?

3. Did the Court of Appeals correctly hold that, under all the relevant contractual provisions, including the reservation of rights, NCR did not agree that the early retirees' health-care benefits would be vested and inalterable?

The two questions that petitioner Stearns purports to present do not arise from the Court of Appeals' decision.

First, the Court of Appeals did not hold that a contract claim cannot be validly stated under ERISA. Instead, the Court of Appeals held that under ERISA any contract affecting benefits includes all pertinent provisions of the employer's health-care plan.

Second, the Court of Appeals did not hold that a contract affecting ERISA benefits should not be construed under federal common law principles. It held instead that the governing federal law includes ERISA principles as well as contract law.

STATEMENT PURSUANT TO RULE 29.6

NCR Corporation has no parent corporation, and no publicly held company owns 10% or more of NCR's stock.

NCR Heath Care Plan for Retired Employees (the correct name for the other respondent) is a group welfare benefits plan under ERISA which is sponsored and completely controlled by NCR.

Respondents NCR Corporation and NCR Health Care Plan for Retired Employees (referred to collectively as "NCR") ask the Court to deny the petition because this case has been decided correctly based upon its undisputed facts and well-established ERISA principles, and the Eighth Circuit's ruling does not conflict with any other Circuit's decision. Petitioner Stearns tries to create the impression of a Circuit conflict by mischaracterizing the Eighth Circuit's holdings and ignoring the key undisputed facts of this case. Most importantly, the petition makes no reference whatever to NCR's written reservation of the right to amend or terminate any health-care benefit provided to its active and retired employees even though that reservation of rights was the decisive factor for the Court of Appeals. Stearns' failure to discuss the core issue in the case in itself requires denial of his petition.

COUNTER-STATEMENT OF THE CASE

A. Facts

Early Out Program

Plaintiff and his class are former NCR employees who retired effective January 1, 1994, under NCR's Enhanced Retirement Program ("Early Out Program"). Through this voluntary program for NCR employees aged 50 or older and with ten years of service by December 31, 1993, plaintiff and the other class members received enhanced pension and life insurance benefits that they would not have received had they retired outside this program.[1]

1. All participating retirees received pensions that were not actuarially reduced for early retirement, as they would have been absent this program, as well as an irrevocable $30,000 lump-sum (Cont'd)

The health care portion of the Early Out program enabled retirees aged 50-54 to receive health care coverage to which they otherwise would not have been entitled, and participants aged 55-61 received more favorable coverage than they would have received if they had retired outside that program.[2] cash payment. In addition, retiring employees aged 50 through 54 were able to retire and immediately commence their unreduced pensions even though retirement eligibility normally began at 55. All these pension benefits immediately vested and were not subject to change.

Early Out participants also received improved life insurance benefits. Retirees aged 50 through 54, who would have otherwise received no life insurance upon retiring, were given at least $5,000 in coverage and up to $10,000 depending upon years of service and salary. Older retirees received substantially higher coverage than they would have received absent the Early Out program. These life insurance benefits are subject to NCR's reserved right to change or terminate welfare benefits, but in fact these benefits have not been changed.

2. For example, those qualified participants aged 50 through 54, who would have had no NCR health care benefits whatever if they had retired outside the Early Out program, became eligible to participate in the NCR Health Care Plan's "80/20" benefit option as well as NCR's prescription drug plan. Participants aged 55 through 61 became eligible for the "90/10" benefit option instead of the "80/20" coverage they would have received if they had retired outside the Early Out program; they were eligible for the prescription drug plan whether or not they participated in that program. The health care benefits of an Early Out participant aged 62 or above, however, did not differ from the coverage available to NCR employees retiring outside that program. Those aged 62 through 64 were already entitled to "90/10" coverage and the prescription drug plan. Once they reached age 65, Early Out participants, like all NCR employees and participating retirees, were entitled only to the Supplemental Plan to Medicare ("MedSupp").

NCR's Reservation of Rights To Amend or Terminate the Early Out Retirees' Health Care Benefits

The NCR Group Benefits Plan in effect in 1993 explicitly stated for both active and retiree health care coverage that:

> PLAN AMENDMENT. The Company [NCR] reserves all rights at any time or from time to time to amend the Plan in whole or in part, including the right to make any amendments to a contract with an Insurance Company, and the right to amend any rules adopted by the Company for the administration of the Plan. No retroactive amendment shall be made unless required under ERISA, any other federal law or under any applicable regulation thereunder. The Company reserves the right to change or cancel the Plan, or any benefits under the Plan, at any time. If the Company cancels the Plan or any benefits under the Plan, participation in the cancelled benefits would end on the date of cancellation.

Information Provided by NCR to Eligible Employees

NCR employees eligible for the Early Out program were required to decide whether to participate by December 17, 1993. During the approximately 10-week period after the announcement of the program on October 1, 1993, until the deadline for participation, NCR provided information about the program to prospective participants on several occasions and each time advised its eligible employees that participants' health care benefits would remain subject to NCR's reserved right to modify them.

1. Early Out Program Questions and Answers Guide.

The "Questions and Answers Guide" provided a chart outlining the Early Out Program's health care benefits and specifically stated, in bold print, that:

> Your [sic] should refer to our "Group Benefits Plan" booklet which was mailed to your home earlier this year for the details of the NCR Health Care Plans. The NCR Health Care Hotline (administered by Prudential Insurance) 1-800-543-0475 is also available to answer your questions.

The Guide's descriptions of the Early Out Program's health care provisions incorporated word-for-word the language used in the 1993 Group Benefits Plan comparing the benefits offered under various coverages detailed in that Plan, such as the calendar year deductible, annual out-of-pocket maximum payment levels, and lifetime maximum out-of-pocket payments. Thus, the Early Out Program's health care benefits were directly derived from the existing NCR Health Care Plan.

2. Early Out Program Seminars.

In addition to the Guide, NCR used seminars to explain the Early Out Program and answer questions that eligible employees might have. Participants in the seminar, including class representative Stearns, were provided with materials containing the following statement:

Retirement Planning Seminar

The following information includes unofficial summaries of selected NCR Corporation benefit plans. As with any plan summary, the official and controlling provisions of the plans are contained in the plan documents. The company reserves the right to amend or terminate any of the plans at any time. In case of any differences, the plan documents will govern. (Emphasis added)

3. Closed-Circuit Television Broadcast.

On November 30, 1993, NCR had a Company-wide closed-circuit television broadcast during which NCR personnel answered questions from eligible employees concerning the Early Out Program's health care coverage. In response to one such question, the NCR spokesperson stated that:

Our intent when we set up these programs was to continue them in a way that is similar to the actives. Unfortunately, given the long time horizon, we can't promise that could go on forever. There's a lot of factors that will intervene—not the least of which is the current national health care debate which could influence the kind of benefits we offer; and it's a very costly benefit to maintain, and we are trying to do everything we can. We understand that these are important issues for everybody and we are working hard to provide the best benefit we can for the long term. (Emphasis added)

In addition, charts were used during the presentation to explain the Early Out Program's health care coverage, and each chart explicitly stated that such coverage was "[s]ubject to plan changes."

4. NCR Newsline Special Edition.

Shortly before the Early Out program's deadline for participation, NCR sent out to all employees a "Special Edition" of its internal newsletter, "NCR Newsline," which included the following "Q and A" with respect to the Program:

> Q: Is there any guarantee that the health care plan for active associates and retirees won't change?
> A: While NCR would like to be able to "guarantee" health care coverage, this is not realistic given the environment in which we run our business. However, it is NCR's intent to continue to separately assess the competitive positions of our active associate and retiree health care plans and to maintain the competitiveness of these plans (including periodic reviews of health care schedules established for each plan). (Emphasis in original)

Plaintiff's "Election"

On December 14, 1993, plaintiff Stearns signed the one-page "Election To Volunteer for the Enhanced Retirement Program and Release of Claims." The "Election" states that:

> After considering my personal situation, I elect to retire under the terms of the Enhanced Retirement Program. I have reviewed and understand the terms of the Program and this Election Form. I understand that by retiring under the Enhanced Retirement Program I am entitled to a package of benefits that exceeds the benefits that I would normally receive.

By signing the Election, Stearns acknowledged that he had sufficient time to consider the Election Form and to have any questions about the program answered, that he had been advised by NCR to consult with an attorney before signing the Form, and that he understood that he will not be eligible for any other benefits. Stearns also released any claims that he may have had against NCR.

Subsequent Changes Made to NCR Group Health Plan without Early Retiree Objection

On several occasions after the Early Retirement Program took effect on January 1, 1994, NCR amended its Group Health Plan by changing the available benefits. These changes, both favorable and adverse, were made applicable to Early Out Program participants, but no Early Out Program participant objected. The governing Plan document throughout the period after the Early Out participants retired continued to reserve NCR's right to alter or cancel any available benefits or the Plan itself.

The 1999 Amendments

In September 1998, NCR informed retirees of further changes in their health care benefits effective January 1, 1999.

These changes applied equally to employees and retirees. All retirees, including Early Out Program participants, would be required to pay a portion of the costs of the medical benefits provided by NCR:

- Participants would be required to pay a premium equal to 10% of the cost for individual coverage and 30% of the cost for spousal coverage.

- Deductibles and annual out-of-pocket maximum payment levels would be increased.

- An emergency room co-payment would be established equal to $50 for each visit, but such co-payment is waived if the beneficiary is admitted to the hospital.

- The co-payment for the mail-order prescription drug program would be increased from $5 to $10 for generic drugs and from $10 to $20 for brand-name drugs.

- The MedSupp Plan would no longer be available to retirees unless they were age 64 as of December 31, 1998.

PROCEEDINGS BELOW

Stearns filed suit on November 4, 1998, on behalf of himself and "all NCR retired employees who retired under the 'USG Enhanced Retirement Program 1993.'" The Complaint asserted three claims: (1) for enforcement of the applicable Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 ("ERISA") plan under 29 U.S.C. § 1132(a)(1)(B), (2) for breach of contract under federal common law and ERISA based upon the retirees' acceptance of the Early Out Program, and (3) for breach of fiduciary duties under 29 U.S.C. §§ 1132(a)(3) and 1109(a).

On September 17, 1999, the District Court certified a class of persons who retired on December 31, 1993, pursuant to NCR's early retirement program and who were not yet 64 years of age on December 31, 1998. Stearns v. NCR Corp., 1999 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 14776 (D. Minn. Sept. 17, 1999)

On May 17, 2000, on cross motions for summary judgment, the District Court rejected Stearns' claim for ERISA plan enforcement because it found that the Early Out Program was not a separate ERISA Plan; instead the Court concluded on undisputed facts that "the 1993 Plan was amended to incorporate the terms of the Early Out Program." The District Court also held that there was no basis for dispute that NCR's reservation of rights in the 1993 Group Benefits Plan applied to retirees as well as active employees. Stearns v. NCR Corp., 57 F. Supp. 2d 954, 957-961 (D. Minn. 2000); Appendix to Petition ("App.") 18a-29a.

However, the District Court granted summary judgment to plaintiff on his breach of contract claim. The Court held that the one-page Election and Release was a bilateral contract between plaintiff and NCR that was incorporated into NCR's ERISA plan. The District Court also held that the Election itself did not reserve NCR's right to amend or cancel the health care benefits provided under the Early Out Program and that any ambiguity on the issue whether NCR's reservation of rights in its ERISA plan applied to the Early Out Program must be construed against NCR. The Court acknowledged that the Election also did not spell out the Early Out Program benefits; that NCR's communications about the Program referred eligible employees to the 1993 Group Benefits Plan booklet for information about those benefits; and that the referenced booklet did contain NCR's reservation of rights. Nevertheless, the Court concluded that the communications were insufficient as a matter of law to bind the participating employees to that reservation of rights and that even though the Election contained no vesting or "lifetime" language, the participating employees' health-care benefits were vested. Id. at 961-967; App. 29a-41a.[3]

The Court of Appeals affirmed the District Court's decision that the Early Out Program is not a separate ERISA Plan. However, it reversed the District Court's decision that NCR had contractually agreed that the Program participants' health-care benefits were vested and inalterable for their lifetimes. The Eighth Circuit held that the District Court had erred by treating the contract as separate from the provisions of NCR's general plan and, in particular, its reservation of rights, and also by applying contractual principles without considering applicable ERISA provisions and case law:

> If a facet is governed by ERISA, any dispute over the terms of that benefit must be resolved by looking to ERISA's statutory provisions and relevant case law. Claims for ERISA benefits are determined by construing the plan in toto, not a single document such as the Releases in isolation. To be sure, "basic principles of contract interpretation" are often relevant in construing an

3. Given this holding, Plaintiff's third claim for fiduciary breach was moot. Id. at 967; App. 41a-42a. Stearns waived the issue by not raising it on his cross-appeal.

> ERISA plan. But if the plan, properly construed, does not afford the benefits at issue, they may not be added to the plan by implication from an "independent bilateral contract." Stearns v. NCR Corp., 297 F.3d 706, 710 (8th Cir. 2002); App. 8a-9a (emphasis in original).[4]

Because the Early Out Program had been incorporated into NCR's general health-care plan by formal amendment, NCR's reservation of rights applied to the participants' health-care benefits.[5] The Court of Appeals cited its prior decisions, as well as those of other Circuits, holding that "an unambiguous reservation-of-rights provision is sufficient without more to defeat a claim that retirement welfare plan

4. Stearns' statement (Pet. 6-7) that the Eighth Circuit may have "mistakenly assumed that a breach of contract claim was not separately pled," is plainly wrong. The Court of Appeals referred explicitly to both claims. 297 F.3d at 709; App. 8a-9a.

5. Although not raising it as a "question presented" by his petition, Stearns appears to contend that the Early Out Program was not incorporated into NCR's general welfare plan. (Pet. 4-5) Both the District Court and Court of Appeals so held, and there is no factual basis for a contrary conclusion. The District Court pointed to the documentation through which NCR's general ERISA plan was amended on December 13, 1993, by its Board of Directors to incorporate the Early Out Program. The District Court also cited the NCR Plan Administrator's subsequent amendment of the 1993 Plan's Summary Plan Description, authorized by NCR's Board, to incorporate the terms of the Early Out Program. This documentation "eliminates any possible doubt that defendants incorporated the terms of the Early Out Program into the 1993 Plan as an amendment, rather than establishing the program as an independent plan." Consequently, Stearns could not "avoid the effects of the 1993 Plan disclaimer [i.e., Reservation of Rights]." 97 F. Supp. 2d at 959; App. 22a-24a.

benefits are vested." 297 F.3d at 712 & n.3; App. 12a. If a reservation-of-rights provision is "facially ambiguous," then the court may use extrinsic evidence to determine whether vesting was intended. But if, as here, the provision is unambiguous, then "there must be an affirmative indication of vesting in the plan documents . . ." to overcome the reservation of rights and establish vesting. Id. Moreover, the fact that the reservation-of-rights provision set forth in the plan documents was not reiterated in the Early Out Program Election form did not create an inference of vesting, as the District Court had held:

> An intent to vest may not be implied from the fact that the Releases and the NCR documents explaining the Program did not address the vesting issue or cross-reference the Reservation of Rights provision. Indeed, not even the ERISA-mandated summary plan description need disclose that welfare plan benefits are not vested. Id.

The Court of Appeals denied Stearns' petition for rehearing en banc without comment or dissent.

REASONS FOR DENYING THE PETITION

I. The Petition Misstates the Grounds for the Court of Appeals' Decision.

The two questions that petitioner Stearns purports to present are based on a glaring misstatement of the Court of Appeals' decision.

First, Stearns claims that the Court of Appeals held that there can be no binding contract between an employer and employee with respect to ERISA welfare benefits. To the contrary, the Court of Appeals specifically said that:

> Without question, there was a bilateral contract between NCR and each Program participant defining the terms under which those parties agreed to terminate their employment relationship. 297 F.3d at 710; App. 7a.

The Eighth Circuit reversed the District Court's decision not on the ground that there could be no valid contract within an ERISA welfare plan, but instead because the District Court had isolated the Election form as the only relevant contractual document. The Court of Appeals correctly ruled that any such contract under ERISA includes all pertinent provisions of NCR's general health-care plan.

Similarly, Stearns erroneously argues that the Court of Appeals gave undue weight to NCR's intent in construing the contract. Instead, the Court of Appeals properly emphasized NCR's written reservation of the right to amend or terminate any or all of the health-care benefits provided under its ERISA plan. 297 F.3d at 711-712; App. 11a-12a. Because of that provision, Stearns was required to present evidence establishing that NCR had agreed that the reservation of rights would not apply to the Early Out Program. Instead, the documentation explaining the Program referred to NCR's general plan, which includes the reservation of rights, and specifically stated that the health-care benefits provided to Early Out Program participants were subject to change.

The second question Stearns purports to raise is that the Court of Appeals refused to apply federal common law principles in construing the contract. Again, that is simply not what the Eighth Circuit said:

> To be sure, "basic principles of contract interpretation" are often relevant in construing an ERISA plan. 297 F.3d at 710; App. 9a.

The Court of Appeals held, however, that the District Court had erred by divorcing its contract construction from NCR's entire ERISA welfare plan and also from "ERISA plan interpretation principles." 297 F.3d at 711; App. 9a. There was simply no reason in this case to use extrinsic evidence to construe the contract because NCR's reservation of rights is unambiguous and Stearns presented no evidence even suggesting that the reservation of rights does not apply to the Early Out Program. In any event, the extrinsic evidence unquestionably established that the health-care benefits provided under the Program were subject to change.

Stearns' petition not only attacks decisions that the Eighth Circuit never made, but it also does not properly challenge that Court's key holdings: (i) that the Early Out Program was incorporated into NCR's general plan and (ii) therefore the reservation of rights in the general plan also applied to that Program. Stearns makes but a fleeting reference to the incorporation issue (Pet. 4-5) and totally ignores the reservation of rights upon which the Court of Appeals based its decision. Consequently, the petition must be denied because it fails to raise the questions actually decided by the Court of Appeals.

II. The Eighth Circuit's Decision Does Not Conflict with Other Circuits' Rulings.

Once Stearns' distortions of the Court of Appeals' opinion are understood, it is clear that the Eighth Circuit's decision does not conflict with any other Circuit's decisions. Indeed, the Court of Appeals cited the leading decisions by other Circuits "requir[ing] clear expressions of an intent to vest welfare plan benefits and enforc[ing] unambiguous reservation-of-rights provisions." 297 F.3d at 712 n.3; App. 12a.[6]

The cases upon which Stearns relies do not conflict with the Eighth Circuit's decision in this case. Frahm v. Equitable Life Assurance Society, 137 F.3d 955, 957-958 (7th Cir. 1998), for example, rejected the plaintiffs' claims that their employer had entered into bilateral contracts with them providing for vested, lifetime health-care benefits. As the Eighth Circuit held in this case, the Seventh Circuit ruled that, although contracts vesting benefits are permissible under ERISA, none of the plaintiffs in fact had entered into such a contract. Also as the Eighth Circuit held here, the Seventh Circuit applied ERISA principles as well as contract law and explained that the governing federal common law was being developed "in ERISA's shadow." Id. at 958.

Stearns relies heavily on Bock v. Computer Associates Int'l, Inc., 257 F.3d 700 (7th Cir. 2001), but that decision is far afield from this case. Bock involved a corporate severance pay agreement for highly paid executives that determined how much they would be paid upon termination. The question raised was whether commission income should be included in the severance pay formula. The corporate general counsel submitted the draft agreement to the employees and told Bock before he signed the agreement that commissions were included. However, when Bock was terminated, his severance pay did not reflect his six-figure commission income. There was no reservation of rights by the employer. The Seventh Circuit viewed the contract as distinctly different from ERISA pension plans and akin to simple employment agreements. It thus applied "general contract principles" to determine the parties' intent. Id. at 704-705.

6. The cases cited are Int'l Union, UAW v. Skinner Engine Co., 188 F.3d 130, 139 (3d Cir.1999); Joyce v. Curtiss-Wright Corp., 171 F.3d 130, 135- 36 (2d Cir.1999); Sprague v. General Motors Corp., 133 F.3d 388, 400 (6th Cir.) (en banc), cert. denied, 524 U.S. 923 (1998); Wise v. El Paso Natural Gas Co., 986 F.2d 929, 937 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 510 U.S. 870 (1993).

When the Seventh Circuit decided a case comparable to this one, its ruling was virtually identical to the Eighth Circuit's decision. In Etherington v. Bankers Life & Cas. Co., 968 F.2d 1218 (7th Cir. 1992) (table), reported in full at 1992 U.S. App. LEXIS 22771, the Court held that the retirees' claim that the employer had reneged on health-care benefit promises was defeated by the employer's unambiguous reservation of rights in its ERISA plan. As Stearns similarly contends here, the retirees argued that the "contract" was limited to certain documents they had been given, but the Seventh Circuit held that all pertinent ERISA plan documents had to be considered. Moreover, the Court also held that, under applicable ERISA principles, statements by the employer in the documents that described the benefits but contained no language that those benefits could never be changed, did not vest the benefits. Id. at *16-*21.

Taylor v. Continental Group Change in Control Severance Pay Plan, 933 F.2d 1227, 1232 (3d Cir. 1991), was also a severance agreement case. The Third Circuit stressed that "[s]everance plans are often similar to employment contracts, whose interpretation requires determining the intent of both contracting parties." Again, there was no reservation by the employer of the right to alter or terminate the severance benefits.

When the Third Circuit decided a case similar to this one, it also upheld summary judgment for the employer, rejecting retirees' contract vesting claim based upon the employer's unambiguous reservation of rights. See In re Unisys Corp. Retiree Med. Benefit ERISA Litig., 58 F.3d 896, 898-899, 903-905 (3d Cir. 1995). The Third Circuit cited Eighth Circuit decisions in support of its holding. Id. at 904.

In Devlin v. Empire Blue Cross & Blue Shield, 274 F.3d 76, 79-80, 84-85 (2d Cir. 2001), the Second Circuit held that the employer's promises of "lifetime" insurance benefits made before it adopted a reservation of rights, raised a triable issue whether the benefits were vested for employees who began their employment before the employer reserved its rights. Because NCR's reservation of rights indisputably predates the Early Out Program, Devlin is irrelevant.

However, Stearns fails to cite Devlin's companion case, Abbruscato v. Empire Blue Cross & Blue Shield, 274 F.3d 90 (2d Cir. 2001), which strongly supports the Eighth Circuit's decision here. In Abbruscato, the Second Circuit affirmed summary judgment for the employer as to the contractual vesting claim because the relevant ERISA plan document, although promising life insurance benefits for the "rest of [the employees'] lives," also reserved the employer's right to amend or terminate those benefits.

The facts of this case provide even greater support to NCR. NCR said nothing about "lifetime" benefits in any of the Early Out Program documentation.

Finally, Sprague v. General Motors Corp., 133 F.3d 388 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 524 U.S. 923 (1998), strongly supports the Eighth Circuit's decision. Relying on General Motors' reservation of rights, the Sixth Circuit rejected the early retirees' contention that the "statements of acceptance" of early retirement, similar to the Elections in this case, were contracts vesting their health-care benefits. Id. at 393-395, 402-403. The Sixth Circuit concluded that the statement of acceptance had incorporated GM's general plan, which included its reservation of rights. Id. at 400-401, 403. Moreover, as in Abbruscato, the employer prevailed in Sprague even though it included statements in its early retirement documentation that the benefits would be provided for the early retirees' "lifetimes." Here, NCR repeatedly said that the health-care benefits were subject to change and were not guaranteed.

III. The Eighth Circuit's Decision Correctly Applies Congressional ERISA Policy.

Not only is the Eighth Circuit's decision in full accord with other Circuits' decisions, it also correctly applies Congressional policy governing ERISA welfare benefit plans. While Stearns argues that the statutory provisions and case law governing such plans must be ignored when an ERISA benefit contract is construed (Pet. 12-15), the exact opposite is true. Congress sought to avoid saddling employers with permanent, vested welfare benefits they could no longer afford. To effectuate that policy, courts have required that any contract concerning such benefits must incorporate all relevant plan documents. As the Second Circuit has explained:

> Congress intended that plan documents and the SPDs [summary plan descriptions] exclusively govern an employer's obligations under ERISA plans. . . .
> With regard to an employer's right to change medical plans, Congress evidenced its recognition of the need for flexibility in rejecting the automatic vesting of welfare plans. Automatic vesting was rejected because the costs of such plans are subject to fluctuating and unpredictable variables. Actuarial decisions concerning fixed annuities are based on fairly stable data, and vesting is appropriate. In contrast, medical insurance must take account of inflation, changes in medical practice and technology, and increases in the costs of treatment independent of inflation. These unstable variables prevent accurate predictions of future needs and costs. While these plaintiffs would be helped by a decision in their favor, such a ruling would not only fly in the face of ERISA's plain language but would also decrease protection for future employees and retirees.

Moore v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 856 F.2d 488, 492 (2d Cir. 1988). Thus, when, as here, the plan includes an unambiguous reservation of rights and no language providing that the benefits will be vested, only one outcome is possible under ERISA: As NCR did in this case, the employer may modify or terminate any or all of the benefits.

Therefore, the Eighth Circuit correctly held that construction of a contract affecting ERISA welfare benefits cannot be based solely on common law contract principles, as Stearns argues, but must apply the policy adopted by Congress in ERISA of preserving the flexibility of employers in exercising their reserved right to change or terminate such benefits.

CONCLUSION

The petition should be denied because it ascribes to the Court of Appeals decisions that it did not make. As a result, the questions purportedly raised by the petition are not properly raised. The "phantom" Eighth Circuit rulings are also the pretext for Stearns' claim of an inter-circuit conflict. In fact, the Eighth Circuit's ruling is in full accord with the decisions of other Circuits. The other Circuits deciding the issue have unanimously held that an unambiguous reservation of rights precludes vesting ERISA welfare benefits. Last but not least, the Eighth Circuit's decision is clearly correct under the undisputed facts, applicable law, and ERISA policy.

Therefore, NCR asks the Court to deny the petition.

The core legal issue in this case has always been the legal effect of a free-standing fully integrated severance agreement that, in significant part, confers health benefits. More specifically, how does the judiciary construe a severance agreement that is unrecognizable from a bilateral contract where the consideration that is the basis of the agreement is for a specified level of benefits?

This is not simply an esoteric inquiry, as much resolves depending upon how the question is answered. If the inclusion of health benefits requires that the contract be viewed as a plan, then:

- the plan itself is an independent legal entity, and can sue and be sued;[1]

- the plan is interpreted to ascertain the settlor's (in this case, NCR's) intent;[2]

- in divining NCR's intent, courts are free to consider documents such as NCR's Board of Directors minutes[3] that were neither a part of the severance agreement nor referenced within its four corners; and

- assuming the correct verbiage is used, the plan administrator's interpretation of the severance agreement is afforded significant deference.[4]

If, however, the severance agreement is construed as a federal common law contract, then

- the written promises represent the memorialization of binding promises, but are not – unlike an ERISA plan – a distinct legal entity;

- the document is interpreted to ascertain the intent of both parties;[5] and

- the contract will be evaluated "under general contract principles, without giving special weight to the intent of either party."[6]

The Trial Court construed the severance agreement as a contract. Applying federal common law, the Trial Court found the terms were ambiguous and its interpretation was unaided through its review of extrinsic evidence, requiring it to construe the ambiguities against the drafter, NCR.

[6] Bock v. Computer Assoc. Intern., Inc., 257 F.3d 700, 705 (7th Cir. 2001).

The Stearns panel took a different approach. The severance agreement terms that included health benefits demanded, in its view, that it consider the severance agreement an ERISA plan, and it thus interpreted the agreement using plan enforcement rules of construction.

As discussed in the opening petition, the Stearns panel's decision created a conflict among the circuits, most notably with the Seventh.

To prop up the Stearns panel decision, NCR makes a number of simply incorrect claims.

Most prominent is NCR's complaint that Stearns has missed the issues "actually presented."[7] NCR argues that the Stearns panel did not hold that a contract claim for benefits was not cognizable. But there is no way to paper over the Stearns panel analysis, which held: "The claim is of course contractual in nature, but the district court erred in looking beyond ERISA plan interpretation principles by splitting plaintiffs' single ERISA claim into distinct ERISA and breach-of-contract components."[8] In other words: Stearns has a single claim for plan benefits, and the Trial Court, and Stearns, were incorrect in attempting to enforce the severance agreement through federal common law contract principles. Stearns has correctly stated the key issue presented by the Stearns panel decision.

NCR also scolds Stearns for "mak[ing] no reference whatsoever to NCR's written reservation of the rights to amend or terminate any health-care benefit provided to its active and retired employees . . .."[9]

In fact, Stearns discussed the reservation on page 4 of his petition. So too, the reservation, incorporated only through a footnote in the severance agreement that suggested "[y]our (sic) should refer to our Group Benefits booklet . . . for the details of the NCR Health Care Plans," makes no reference whatsoever to the two health programs – "Option One" or Choice 2" – that were the subject of the severance agreement. This inconvenient fact is unmentioned by NCR and unresolved by the Stearns panel. It did not, however, elude the Trial Court: "In order to understand the disclaimer applied, Early Out Program participants would have had to refer to the entire 1993 Plan booklet and surmise indirectly that the disclaimer extended to the enhanced benefits promised under the contract simply because basic descriptions of the Option One, Choice 2 and the Supplement to Medicare plan are outlined in the same booklet."[10]

Finally, NCR elevates its preferred extrinsic evidence beyond all reckoning. The same evidence (except for the purported failure to object,[11] which was never presented) was before the Trial Court, which found it unpersuasive.[12] Observed a different federal court, in construing a parallel claim (though it involved a different set of retirees, and a different severance agreement): "NCR can no more rely upon oral statements to enforce ERISA welfare plan rules than can Plaintiffs to assert welfare plan rights. In fact, even if videotape statements are not to be regarded as oral statements, U.S. Group employees were not required to view the videotape as part of their early retirement agreement, and it would be unfair to hold them accountable for not doing so."[13]

NCR's severance agreement is cognizable and enforceable as a contract. The Stearns panel erred by applying plan interpretation principles, and its decision should be reversed.
